“ Take life day by day, and appreciate the little things you achieve. ”

Before committing to this amazing experience, I worked for over 10 years in marketing and communications. Leaving my job was a really difficult decision but I never doubted that living abroad was going to be an enriching experience...and it is!

Volunteering with IDCN was a great experience which allowed me to work within a multicultural team and learn from others' experiences. In fact, several HR managers suggested me to place my IDCN volunteering at the beginning of my CV, as a really working experience and not just at the end. Think about reinventing yourself professionally. Not every career or professional background fits every country's needs. Some areas of expertise are more international than others. Participating in IDCN events and networking is very important. Take advantage of these events to have your CV proofread and get interviews planned. Here are some key takeaways from my experience:

--Don't stress too much, the right opportunity will come at the right moment..

--Don't forget your home country's network and keep in touch!

Take life day by day and appreciate the little things you achieve, enjoy the process. I know it is not easy, but if I made it, so can you...
